

Stern Stewart MVA Performance Rankings United States

Plus the worst wealth destroyers.
GE, Coke, and Microsoft are the trio to beat.

As a parade of '90s management mantras flop or fade—remember reengineering and right-sizing?—one Big Idea has not only survived but is captivating increasing numbers of pro-shareholder CEOs, aggressive money managers, and tough-minded analysts. The concept is economic value added, and all three groups are demanding that companies adopt it as their guiding principle. In a single, simple measure, EVA answers the most basic question in business: Is management creating or destroying wealth for stockholders? "Accounting benchmarks just don't do the job," says Robert Boldt, the senior investment officer at Calpers, the $135 billion pension fund. "Only EVA gives a real picture of value creation."

Indeed, FORTUNE's annual list of the top wealth creators shows how outstanding EVA performance builds piles of market value added (MVA), or huge gains for shareholders. Put simply, EVA helped American companies vastly improve their management by sending them back to the basics. Far from being new, EVA, in effect, is one of the long-standing pillars of finance theory: Until a company posts a profit greater than its cost of capital, it's not making money for shareholders, no matter how good accounting earnings look.

In the 1980s, AT&T, Eastman Kodak, and dozens of others forgot to follow that simple maxim. Instead they squandered heaps of capital on wild diversification, which jacked up growth—and hammered their stocks.

Enter Stern Stewart, a New York consulting firm that convinced—or rather reminded—CEOs that to move share prices they shouldn't grow earnings at any cost, but simply grow them a lot faster than they add new capital, like plants and inventories. Its founders, Joel Stern and Bennett Stewart, dubbed those Uber-earnings EVA, then packaged the concept, showing clients how to use EVA for every-thing from motivating managers to picking investments.

This year's list appears on the fifth anniversary of a FORTUNE article that introduced to the general public this new, groundbreaking way of both running and judging companies. FORTUNE revealed something most managers didn't know: Roberto Goizueta, CEO of Coca-Cola, was an ardent EVA fan, and it was EVA that guided Goizueta to shed far-flung businesses, squeeze more Coke syrup from fewer plants, and generally build a hoard of value. "The FORTUNE story really put EVA on the map as the leading management tool," says Michael Jensen of Harvard Business School.

Since then, EVA has been on a tear. Though Stern Stewart has trademarked the term, it doesn't have a monopoly on the idea. Now, practically everyone is touting the basic concept, including McKinsey, KPMG, and Ernst & Young.

EVA is changing not only how managers run companies, but the way Wall Street prices them. In the past three years, Credit Suisse First Boston and Goldman Sachs have instructed their analysts to deemphasize measures like earnings per share and return on equity in favor of EVA. That shift puts them in sync with money managers like Oppenheimer and Calpers. EVA is also one of the yardsticks Calpers relies on to assemble its annual list of America's worst underperformers, which last year included software maker Sybase and network manager EDS. Calpers demanded that one of the laggards-Boldt is not saying which one-adopt EVA. The company agreed. EVA is simply annual operating profit after-tax minus a special charge for the cost of capital. That charge corrects a glaring loophole in standard accounting. In financial statements, companies pay nothing for equity capital. It looks like free money. But equity is really very expensive. To raise money from investors, companies must return at least as much as shareholders could earn from a basket of stocks with the same risk-say, 12% a year. That's the cost of equity capital. If the company doesn't earn at least its capital cost (blended to include the cost of debt), it can't keep attracting new investment.

Hence, generating accounting profits is like playing volleyball with the net down. EVA puts it back up. Companies pay a stiff fee for all the equity they use, including retained earnings and the proceeds from stock sales. Stern Stewart makes a lot of other adjustments to standard accounting, such as capitalizing R&D as an investment rather than expensing research costs every year. What's left after the capital charge-the real profit for shareholders-is EVA. With all the distortions ironed out, EVA does a far better job of explaining stock prices than EPS or return on equity, neither of which includes a charge for equity.

The list that follows also spotlights MVA, the market's reward for strong EVA growth. In other words, MVA is the premium the market awards a company over and above the money investors have put into it, based on the market's expectations of future EVAS. It is calculated by adding up the capital shareholders and creditors have furnished, including the proceeds from equity and debt offerings, as well as retained earnings. Then this is subtracted from the current market value of both the company's stocks and its bonds. The difference is MVA.

Naturally, MVA, even for superbly run companies, waxes and wanes along with swings in the stock market as a whole. In fact, last year's surge added lots of MVA to good companies and bad. But in the long term, it's excellent management that produces large, positive MVAS. The accompanying list proves the point. Three companies, General Electric, Coca-Cola, and Microsoft, have occupied the top three places on the two most recent lists, though GE edged out Coke for No.1 this year. GE did just what a company is supposed to do: Through the managerial acumen of Jack Welch, it had turned (as of last Jan. 1) $59 billion in investors' money into $255 billion of total market value; the difference is $196 billion in MVA. By contrast, General Motors recalls the joke that the easiest way to make a small fortune is to start with a big one. Investors have put in $75 billion in capital. If they had cashed out their GM stocks and bonds, they'd have received only $61 billion; GM's MVA of -$13.9 billion represents the amount of wealth destroyed.

Intel and Microsoft are a fascinating study in contrasts. Intel posted $4.8 billion in EVA, $2 billion more than Microsoft. But its MVA is $54 billion lower. Looking ahead, investors are betting that Intel won't be able to sustain its EVA edge. The reason? They think that Intel will get far tougher competition from an AMD or National Semiconductor than Microsoft will encounter from rivals like Novell. Microsoft, meanwhile, reigns as the Coca-Cola of high tech, boasting a smoothly rising stream of EVA. Neither Microsoft nor Intel formally uses EVA, but they're naturals at what EVA companies treat as a science: adding dabs of capital to make mountains of wealth.
